The people in each of the suburbs lived on the products of their farms and gardens. The land in Kalau and the main town, was very low, level and damp, while that of Sando was high, dry and sandy. There was a ditch, containing foul stagnant water, which passed closely around a portion of the central town and through the whole of Kalau; all the gardens of which were watered from this ditch, the water of which was used also to wash their garden vegetables. Behla believed that cancer followed this ditch and that the water used from it to wash the vegetables, infected them and many of these which were eaten uncooked, thereby transmitted the germs of cancer to the people who used them. This observation certainly furnishes very strong proof of the parasitic origin of cancer, but it gives no positive evidence that water was the medium through which it was conveyed. Again, in the Cancer Number of the Practitioner for April, 1899, we find two articles, which seem to be especially important for our purpose. One of them is entitled The Medical Geography of Cancer in England and Wales, by Alfred Haviland; the other The Local Distribution of Cancer and Cancer Houses, by D Arcy Powers, F. R. C. S. On reading these over...
